son—something by which they were identified. Villenessant, editor of the Paris Figaro, says a Paris correspondent is a stout, thick-set medium height, coarse, sensual face, staring eyes expressive of cunning and impudence. He wears his hair cut short and brush-like, a scrubby mustache overshadowing his thick lips. He affects a bonhomie which renders him popular with the waiters in the restaurants. There are few disreputable things in journalism which he has not attempted. And he doesn't like Americans.

"Miss Grundy," writing for the Graphic, tells a queer story about Colonel Nick Smith, son-in-law of Horace Greville. His first wife, a Miss Lennox of Leinster, was thy with the rebellion, and he was an officer in the federal army while he was doing his courting in the first year of the war. Miss Pope would never allow him to visit her in his uniform, and not long after their marriage, or about the time it occurred, he resigned in the army. When he married Miss Greeley he adopted her faith, the Roman Catholic, and not long since he named his infant boy Horace Greeley, dropping the name of Smith so far as the child is concerned. "So it may be said," says Miss Grundy, "that he gave up his country for his religion."

When Gen. Changarnier was in Africa he was Colonel of a regiment, and was more fearful of a draft of air than of the lead of his opponents. His mind appeared to be constantly occupied with drafts of air. On one occasion the balls were flying thick around him. An officer saluted, and said, "Colonel, you are exposed." "True," said Changarnier, "we are fighting in a gorge." He turned up his coat collar.

A great race has just become extinct. Prim Gustave Vasa is dead, and with him dies the last male branch of the royal house of Vasa, a line founded by the Gustave who freed his country from the Danish yoke. Another member of the dynasty was Gustave III, the victim of one assassination; and Gustave IV, the victim of another.

opera. The dead prince's father, Gustave IV, had so bitter a hatred to Napoleon I that when the King of Prussia sent him the Order of the Black Eagle, which had also been bestowed upon Napoleon, he returned it, "bestowed upon Napoleon this honor forbade him to be the brother-in-law of a murderer."

John C. Hoennan's ghost materialized in Rochester the other night. It was a muscular and frisky ghost. The form was stalwart and the arms thereof were exceedingly big. "Ef there's anybody as doesn't believe," said Mr. Hoennan with great impressiveness, casually balancing himself in front of a partition and striking it a terrible blow, "let him stand up. Ef there is any one as is inclined to question this performance, let him come forrard. I'm think we are all believers," said Mr. Heenan, smiling sweetly. "But there is one more test. I want somebody to grab me. Oh! I should like to have somebody grab me! Just make the least motion to grab me!" and Mr. Heenan extended his hand, slightly bending the knuckles of the flexible fingers of the same hand in the direction of the other hand.

Ruskin does not tolerate tobacco; he is very fond of chess; and, it is said that he is very much affected by the state of the weather, invariably feeling well on a bright day and out of doors on a dull day.

The report of Justin McCarthy's death was probably owing to the fact that Thomas Francis McCarthy, a well-known London journalist died very suddenly about three weeks ago.

but at the time of his death was a leader-writer on the Chronicle. He had been ill and was urged to take a rest, but remained at the office, doing a sick friend's work as well as his own. At a few minutes before midnight he gave in his last article. Just as they were emptying the article into the presses, at 2 a. m., he died.

When M. Thiers travelled in Belgium, not long ago, a worthy brewmaster in one town deeply desired the honor of presentation to the French statesman. Much embarrassed, the good man made his bow, and endeavoring to say something at once delicate and flattering, tremulously exclaimed: "Now that I have seen you, Monsieur Thiers, you can die!"

The Various Types and their Personal Peculiarities.

This is a very dull season for watering place belles, and in all the fashionable resorts of this region they present a rather drooping appearance. There are different varieties of these belles, and they attract in different ways. At Castine the other day we remarked the contrast between those of that place and those of Bar Harbor. The atmosphere of Castine is unlike that of any other summer resort I have ever visited, it is a Boston watering-place, and those who have not the true Boston man-the very select society which is to be found there every season. The young people do not flirt over croquet or under the influence of the dreamy music of the waltz, but go botanizing together, and come home with the discovery of other strange and new things besides plants. They read their books and at the same time exchange tender glances with preoccupied eyes. They dig deep into the soil of the city and find untold things; they sit on the balcony on starlit evenings, and though they do not talk sentimental, still the sentiment oozes out somewhere, and large words slip rather sleepily from rosy lips. The belles of this place would not be burdened with beaux in many localities. They are too self-asserted, they have too much angularity of chin; wear

They pinch their noses with glasses, and are calmly indifferent on the subject of trees. They scout the country in short skirts; they are amply able to talk politics, they sketcho from nature; they converse in German and French; they read Greek; they are conversant with every science under the sun. On frivolous minded young ladies with huge gaps exposed by their crooked teeth and frowns; on all young gentlemen who smile, though without the gleam of a frivolous order they bewilder and frighten to the last extremity, though their manners be of the most gracious quality. They are up with the lark; they do not deprive the night of its pleasures, and they are up at midnight. They inspect the books which strangers drop in the intervals of reading, with

It is as if they might be poisonous. They speak with contempt of those who carry about with them a little bottle of castine, and of slang gives them such a shock that they are well nigh deprived of their reason. Castine is a thing that is not to be trifled with, and to one's enjoyment of its charms. Not every one is at home in the society of the hotels and boarding-houses, though all may enjoy the beauties of the coast. The old mansions on the main street, the ruined fort on the hill, the old historical houses, the ancient wharves and the old fortifications, the old mansions on the hill overlooking the blue waters of the bay is a pleasant abode enough with cool chambers and a well spread table. There are lovely walks and drives, and the air is so pure and fresh as meadows can be though it is past midsummer, and a plenty of jolly little craft are about, and when one is in a mood for sailing. But who is when one is a society? Who is able to stand before a Castine

At the watering-places around Portland there is another style of belle, one who talks slang, and who is not a belle at all. She is a coarsely-dressed, coarsely-mannered woman, who wears like a professional. She is likely to be a Canadian, though there are those from other quarters. Her tone is so fascinating to the gentlemen who frequent these parts, and is entirely satisfied with herself in every respect, that she is sure to be successful wherever she goes. Whatever her age may be, she acts the child. She opens her round eyes in perplexity at the first question, and is continually asking for information on every subject which is brought up, in sweet appealing tones. Her lovely mouth is forever smiling. She clasps her hands together, and looks up at you with glances. She joins in all the rough rhapsodies which are started at the hotel, and is so frail, and so kind in her compliments, that she is almost tender. She is so ready to be required to help one along, to support her steps on the rough
